

"...the purposes of human life are not found at home; the role of each individual is part of a system of interactions which take place in a common world based on shared values. To participate we have to leave the house and choose a path. When our social task is accomplished, however, we withdraw to our home to recover our personal identity. Personal identity, thus, is the content of private dwelling"

(Norberg-Schulz, 1985, p. 8)

To us, this states the importance of incorporating different modes and atmospheres, when considering social and private environments. Further it underlines the importance of the paths, which guides us and ensures encounters and participation in life. A path which should be contributed by a range of possibilities, however still ensures room for personal contemplation and solitude.

Hence we understand the relations as important, to in general be able to choose a shift of atmospheres. Accordingly, the build environment should, through measurable and immeasurable means, accommodate an interrelationship between the different modes of life, encouraging participation and withdrawal, thus achieving a fulfilling life. This is why we in this master thesis question how the relations are achieved?

LONE JØRGENSEN & MAJA KLAUSEN
Stud. MSc. Eng. Arch.

"...the purposes of human life are not found at home; the role of each individual is part of a system of interactions which take place in a common world based on shared values. To participate we have to leave the house and choose a path. When our social task is accomplished, however, we withdraw to our home to recover our personal identity. Personal identity, thus, is the content of private dwelling"

(Norberg-Schulz, 1985, p. 8)

To us, this states the importance of incorporating different modes and atmospheres, when considering social and private environments. Further it underlines the importance of the paths, which guides us and ensures encounters and participation in life. A path which should be contributed by a range of possibilities, however still ensures room for personal contemplation and solitude.

Hence we understand the relations as important, to in general be able to choose a shift of atmospheres. Accordingly, the build environment should, through measurable and immeasurable means, accommodate an interrelationship between the different modes of life, encouraging participation and withdrawal, thus achieving a fulfilling life. This is why we in this master thesis question how the relations are achieved?

LONE JØRGENSEN & MAJA KLAUSEN
Stud. MSc. Eng. Arch.

"...the purposes of human life are not found at home; the role of each individual is part of a system of interactions which take place in a common world based on shared values. To participate we have to leave the house and choose a path. When our social task is accomplished, however, we withdraw to our home to recover our personal identity. Personal identity, thus, is the content of private dwelling"

(Norberg-Schulz, 1985, p. 8)

To us, this states the importance of incorporating different modes and atmospheres, when considering social and private environments. Further it underlines the importance of the paths, which guides us and ensures encounters and participation in life. A path which should be contributed by a range of possibilities, however still ensures room for personal contemplation and solitude.

Hence we understand the relations as important, to in general be able to choose a shift of atmospheres. Accordingly, the build environment should, through measurable and immeasurable means, accommodate an interrelationship between the different modes of life, encouraging participation and withdrawal, thus achieving a fulfilling life. This is why we in this master thesis question how the relations are achieved?

LONE JØRGENSEN & MAJA KLAUSEN
Stud. MSc. Eng. Arch.

"...the purposes of human life are not found at home; the role of each individual is part of a system of interactions which take place in a common world based on shared values. To participate we have to leave the house and choose a path. When our social task is accomplished, however, we withdraw to our home to recover our personal identity. Personal identity, thus, is the content of private dwelling"

(Norberg-Schulz, 1985, p. 8)

To us, this states the importance of incorporating different modes and atmospheres, when considering social and private environments. Further it underlines the importance of the paths, which guides us and ensures encounters and participation in life. A path which should be contributed by a range of possibilities, however still ensures room for personal contemplation and solitude.

Hence we understand the relations as important, to in general be able to choose a shift of atmospheres. Accordingly, the build environment should, through measurable and immeasurable means, accommodate an interrelationship between the different modes of life, encouraging participation and withdrawal, thus achieving a fulfilling life. This is why we in this master thesis question how the relations are achieved?

LONE JØRGENSEN & MAJA KLAUSEN
Stud. MSc. Eng. Arch.

